The Strategic Plan for Biodiversity 2011–2020 and the Aichi Targets promote the conservation of areas of high biological value, in ecologically representative and well-connected systems of protected areas and other area-based conservation measures besides fostering ecological restoration for increasing ecosystem resilience to global change.
Conservation and restoring areas of high biological value is imperative, above all for climate change adaptation and mitigation, as well as promoting instruments for sustainable use, such as biological corridors.